

LOCATION CONTRACTS

THE LOCATION AGREEMENT

If filming is to take place on your property, you can expect to have a written location agreement provided by the Location Manager. This will be a contract between the production company and the "Location Provider". The Location Provider can be an individual, business, company or other entity that owns the property or has authority to grant access to the production company for the purpose of recording images or sound. The location agreement will typically contain the following information:

- The name and address of the production company.

- The title of the production.

---

- The name and address of the location provider.

---

- The address of the property and any additional information specifying areas within the property that are to be utilised.

---

- Dates and times specifying when access is required to the property. This should include any set-up or wrap-out time required by art department or technical crew. There may also be provision of additional days or varied times due to weather delays.

---

- A statement of indemnity provided by the Production Company to the Location Provider to protect the Location Provider against all claims that may arise from the Production Company's use of the property.

---

- A statement by the Production Company to repair or remedy any damage caused to the property by the Production Company use of the property during the period of access (ordinary wear and tear excepted).

---

- A statement by the Location Provider to grant release over all copyright of any images or sounds recorded at the Location.

---

- A statement by the Production Company confirming it holds a current public liability insurance policy and the value of the cover (usually a minimum of $20 million).

---

- Details of an agreed fee to be paid to the Location Provider in consideration of the rights granted to the Production Company.
